A true commercial success generally requires at least two very different types of experience: a good idea or invention, and someone who sees its potential and has the ability to produce it in quantity and sell it to the world. And as Kroc might say, there's still a world of opportunity out there for any smart, forward-looking person who knows a good idea when he hears it. 4.6Rating: 4.6 / 10 from 22,821 users When their transfer bus crashes into a forest in West Virginia, a group of inmates and a prison officer meet a trafter fleeing from cannibalistic mountaineers who killed his friends. From "Tucker: The Man and His Dream" to "The Social Network" and "Jobs," the filmmaker's re-telling of the startup's story usually is a combination of reluctant admiration mixed with the perception/dramatic hook that the only way someone in business can be successful is by stepping on someone else (although in "Tucker," the entrepreneur was the guy who got stepped on, unlike the Winkelvoss twins or Steve Wozniak).The Founder" is no different. It is Hollywood's version of Kroc's story, and people still around from those early days say it plays fast and loose with the truth. This is the 3rd part ofÅ The Wrong Turn Series. The title refers to the fact that he went so far as to credit himself with founding McDonald's, even though two McDonald brothers invented everything from the number of steps required in food preparation all the way up to the golden arches. The bus driver heads to their destination with the guards and the prisoners but a tow truck drove by Three Finger hits the bus that falls off the road.
